EPA Blocks Glyphosate Warning On Labels

Glyphosate was added to California's Proposition 65 list of carcinogens in July 2017. Products containing Glyphosate, like Monsanto's RoundUp, were supposed to have warning labels on the packaging that stated potential cancer risks. The glyphosate cancer warnings were scheduled to be on the packaging of glyphosate products in summer of 2018 But in 2018 Monsanto challenged the law and a federal judge temporarily banned California's plans to add cancer warning labels on glyphosate-based products. And now the EPA has stated they will "no longer approve product labels claiming glyphosate is known to cause cancer."

Related: Foods Most Likely to Contain Glyphosate

The EPA will not allow labels that indicate a link between glyphosate and cancer. Registrants selling products that contain glyphosate have 90 days from August 7th to show compliance removing the warning.

> The State of California's much criticized Proposition 65 has led to misleading labeling requirements for products, like glyphosate, because it misinforms the public about the risks they are facing."
>
> EPA Statement

Related: How To Heal Your Gut

This means that while Costco bans glyphosate and Bayer/Monsanto is facing more than 10,000 lawsuits and losing millions of dollars in those lawsuits (maybe billions soon) for the damage glyphosate can do to one's health, it won't have a warning label, but coffee and supplements sold in California will have cancer warnings labels.